

A entrada del Rey D. Manoel em Castella: Ceremonial and musical links, between the courts of D. Manuel and the Catholic Monarchs, 1498

Bernadette Nelson

Wolfson College, Oxford

CESEM - Centro de Estudos de Sociologia e Estética Musical

Faculdade de Ciências Sociais e Humanas da Universidade Nova de Lisboa

Following the death of D. João II in 1495, D. Manuel was crowned King of Portugal. Two years later he married Isabel of Castile (widow of prince Afonso), resulting in the reigniting of intense musical connections between the Spanish and Portuguese royal courts. The early months of their marriage coincided with the death of Isabel's brother, prince Juan, heir to the Castilian throne, with the result that they unexpectedly became heirs of the joint Castilian, Aragonese and Portuguese crowns. In March 1498 Manuel and Isabel travelled to Toledo and Zaragoza for the oath-taking ceremonies, taking with them representatives of the royal court along with the cappella real and musicians. Four years later, an almost identical ceremony took place in Toledo when the Philip the Handsome and princess Juana were sworn as heirs to the Castilian throne, for which there were also a series of important ceremonies.

This extremely significant meeting of the Portuguese court and the courts of Catholic Monarchs in 1498 has been somewhat overlooked and has certainly not entered musicological literature to date. Yet close investigation into accounts of this event and available documentation concerning musicians reveals a number of connections between the courts, some of which are indicative of employment patterns at that time and probable musical exchanges. Further, analysis of biographical data, including of leading Spanish composers such as Francisco de Peñalosa, reveals that this occasion may have been pivotal for subsequent careers of many musicians. This paper outlines this important event, highlighting its musical elements, the connections to be found between Portuguese and Spanish musicians, and the possible ramifications of these encounters.

Bernadette Nelson is a post-doc researcher at CESEM-FCSH (Centre for the Study of Sociology and Aesthetics of Music) at the Universidade Nova in Lisbon, and is also affiliated with Wolfson College, Oxford. She has published widely on topics in Iberian and Franco-Flemish music, specialising in institutional and contextual studies, musico-liturgical studies, compositional studies, and the sacred music of Cristóbal de Morales and Noel Bauldeweyn. Recent publications include Pure Gold. Golden Age Sacred Music in the Iberian World: A Homage to Bruno Turner (edited with Tess Knighton; Kassel, 2011). She is also coordinator of polyphonic sources for the Portuguese Early Music Database (PEM). Current research projects centre on music at the Portuguese royal court and chapel during the Renaissance.